Speaker Bio

The progress of society depends on how organizations in both the public and private sector (for profit and not for profit) perform. This is about people and the decisions that are made. This is also about purpose and the way progress and performance are measured. My academic training embraces engineering and economics (at Cambridge) and accountancy (articles with Cooper Brothers in London). My experience includes work in the private sector including financial management (CFO and controllership), line management (Manufacturing VP, project management, arrangement of financing, restructuring, etc.) My public sector and not-for-profit experience includes assignments for the World Bank, the United Nations and others ... project identification / preparation / appraisal / monitoring and evaluation / supervision / etc. Also planning work at national level, sector level and regional level. Also system work to improve government financial management and performance analysis. Have done work in more than 50 countries. Passionate about the role of metrics in the management of performance, not only profit performance but also people / social performance and environmental / natural system performance.
